ABSTRACT

The advent of democracy in 1994 and the local government reform process that followed heralded a new era of consultation with citizens on matters that affected them. One important aspect of this reform process is the introduction of the Ward committee system to foster public participation and subsequently the management of development policy. However, municipalities are increasingly challenged by service delivery protests. The challenge seems to be that Ward committees, having been established for the above purpose, have not been as effective as they should. A study in this regard was conducted amongst specific Ward committees in the Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality.

The purpose of the study was to determine what inhibits Ward committees from playing their required role in respect of the management of development policy with particular reference to the abovementioned municipality. It was further intended to determine, although not comprehensively, some of the root causes of poor service delivery over and above bureaucratic incapacity. Seventy-six Ward committees of Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality before the current municipal realignment were categorized into two groups: those that experienced service delivery protests and those who did not. Following the categorization of Ward committees, one from each group was randomly selected to constitute units of analysis. A questionnaire was administered among the Ward committee members and interviews conducted with some ward councillors, including the Speaker.

One of the findings is that the municipality has established Ward committees to ensure local community participation. This is despite participation being limited to compulsory consultation on issues of Integrated Development Plans and budgets. Another finding is that the municipality convenes a session immediately after the election of Ward committees to induct them into their roles and responsibilities. Despite this, the Ward committees are not adequately capacitated to discharge their mandate of, inter alia, making meaningful inputs on policy development, implementation, monitoring and evaluation.

To address the above, it is essential that Ward committees are capacitated. This will include, but is not limited to, improving communication with those committees, allocating resources to them, promoting new or strengthening existing interest groups, acting upon issues raised by Ward committees, and developing and undertaking training programmes based on a training needs analysis.

CHAPTER ONE

INTRODUCTION

1.1 BACKGROUND

Local governments are institutions closest to the communities they serve. Their roles include identifying local problems, setting priorities for development, mobilising resources, implementing programmes, and monitoring and evaluating progress. To this effect, local governments have been established around the world and differ according to the peculiarities of each country. In addition, their effectiveness depends on the challenges they face as well as prevailing material conditions.

In Europe, for instance, local government evolved from looking at the council as being both a provider of public services and a public body based on a community of local people. The key issue was the organisation of large urban areas inclusive of their capital cities. However, the problem remained one of how to structure and connect the different levels of urban organisation while allowing for functional needs as well as the demands of democracy (Marcou and Wollman, in 1st Global report by United Cities and Local Government, 2008: 130).

In pursuance of the above, local authorities were organised around two levels, namely local councils and a higher level covering a more extensive constituency. Elections of local councils in all the countries of the Council of Europe are through direct, free and secret universal vote. The system of proportional representation is practiced in almost all the countries, apart from Georgia where, in addition to a party list system, members are elected from single mandate constituencies.

In Latin America, the evolution of local government followed a major process of decentralisation which emerged during the period of democratisation from the late 1980s. The main features of that process included greater political autonomy for, and strengthening of, local government. Accordingly, two versions of local government emerged: 'managerial' and 'governmental' types. The managerial type is the type of local government whose primary purpose is the efficient delivery of services with clearly defined competencies that are regulated by statute and circumscribed by the application of the principle of ultra vires (Nickson, 2011:1). It is held accountable to local citizens for its economic performance in the delivery of services. Consequently, citizen participation is viewed as a vehicle contributing towards improved service delivery.

With the governmental type, there is a wider role for local government, both as the mouthpiece of shared community interests of a locality and also in making policy choices in its name within the wider body politic, “as a natural part of an organic whole” (Norton in Nickson, 2011: 3). Emphasis is placed on ways and means that foster citizen participation with organisations of civil society in mind. In trying to locate the Latin American local government system within the two types, a point is made by Nickson (2011: 6) that they would seem at first to conform to the ‘governmental’ type.

The constitutions of almost every country define a municipality as a primary and autonomous unit of government within the national political system. Elections for this unit of government throughout the region, with the exception of Panama where the ‘first-past-the-post’ system based on sub-municipal electoral wards is practised, take place under the d’Hondt system of proportional representation (Nickson, 2011: 11).

In the Asia-Pacific region, most countries undertook reforms aimed at decentralising and devolving government functions to the local level. Issues that drove the reform process included public sector efficiency, democratisation and political-economic regimes shifting to mixed and market economies. The legislative base for this is determined by higher legislatures through either the central government or state legislatures. The law also provides for citizen participation and partnerships and entitles local authorities to define appropriate forms of popular participation and civic engagement in decision-making and fulfilment of their function of community leadership. It is only in India where the ward system, with members acting as public auditors of the development process, is practised. To this effect, councils or assemblies are elected by secret ballot on the basis of direct, equal and universal suffrage.

In the United States, local governments are governmental jurisdictions below the level of the state with most states having two tiers: counties and municipalities. Counties and county-equivalents form the first tier administrative division of the states, although not all of them have organised county governments. In areas lacking county governments, services are provided by lower level townships, municipalities or states. At the local level, elections for county or city governments are filled by election especially within the legislative branch, the extent of which varies from county to county.

In Africa, the evolution of local government was necessitated by what Olowu and Wunsch (2004: 1) refers to as “democratic” decentralisation. By this they mean that significant elements of authority, responsibility for services, fiscal and human resources were transferred to local governments. They further state that major revisions in accountability were made so that the local public had a significant role in its own “local governance”, through the existence of working local systems of collective action that manage a locality’s public affairs and are accountable to local residents.

The 1st Global Report of the United Cities and Local Governments (2008: 23) states that, “there has been a substantial rise in the number of democratic political systems since the 1990s as opposed to the 1950s and 1960s, the two decades following African independence”. During that time, one-party political systems predominated and access to state power was often gained by means of coups d’état. The report further states that, “most political systems are now multiparty and leaders are chosen by universal suffrage. In respect of local government, many countries such as Mozambique, Benin, Mauritania and South Africa do allow independent candidates in local elections despite allowing political parties to monopolise local and national politics. The following section outlines the evolution of local government in South Africa.

1.2 LOCAL GOVERNMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA

1.2.1 Evolution of Local Government

Local government developed as a form of decentralised local indirect self-government, area-bound and somewhat limited in powers (Craythorne, 1994: 7). The legal framework as it evolved over time provided for the form, content, powers and functions to be performed at that level. Of note is the pressure from burghers in the 18th century for them to have a greater share in the government of the Cape Colony (Craythorne, 1994: 106). The historical background in South Africa highlights a local government system structured along racial lines. There were White local government institutions as well as those for Coloured and Indian people. Those for Black people were, until 1971, administered by White local authorities on a decentralised basis.

To ensure greater participation by communities, the Ward committee system was introduced. This worked alongside the single constituency systems which were applicable in all the then-provinces, namely the Cape Province, the Orange Free State and Transvaal, as well as for black local authorities, except in the province of Natal where boroughs were divided into at least nine wards. Their role entailed being a form of contact between the people and municipal commissioners (Craythorne, 1994: 106).

The number of wards was determined by the administrator within the powers vested in provinces. This took into account the differences in respect of provincial legislation. With regard to Black local authorities, provision was made for the administrator to decide whether they did or did not have wards. This was, inter alia, a source of dispute that contributed to community struggles and subsequently local government reform.

1.2.2 Local Government reform

Local government reform in South Africa followed a protracted process of negotiations dating back to the late 1980s. During that period, individual local authorities, political parties and civic organisations engaged in negotiations in order to shape the structures of municipalities within their localities. The process gained momentum following the State of the Nation address by the then President of South Africa F.W. de Klerk in 1991, and culminated in the establishment, within the ambit of the Interim Measures for Local Government Act of 1991, of local government negotiating forums across the country.

The African National Congress (ANC) argued that government at that time was attempting to manipulate local government initiatives and pushed for negotiations to be conducted at national level. Consequently, deliberations for the democratic structures of local government began within the Local Government Negotiation Forum (LGNF). The forum consisted of two delegations, statutory and non-statutory. The statutory side comprised representatives of central, provincial and local government while the non-statutory side comprised civil society organisations under the banner of the South African National Civics Organisation.

The LGNF was a voluntary and not statutory body, with its role being that of advising the Multi-Party Negotiating Council with regard to options pertaining to local government structures. The outcome was the introduction of the Local Government Transition Act No. 209 of 1993. This Act provided for, inter alia, phases in local and metropolitan reform and also established a platform for local government elections in 1995 as provided for in the interim Constitution. Further reform following the local government elections of 1995 led to the current electoral system which provides for proportional representation and ward representation. The provision of ward representation was intended to, inter alia, allow for greater community participation in policy-making and thus improve service delivery at local government level. To this effect, a legislative framework governing such reform was developed.

1.3 LEGISLATIVE FRAMEWORK IN SOUTH AFRICA

The legislative framework governing local government reform in South Africa is derived from the following five documents: The Constitution of South Africa Act; the White Paper on Local Government; the Municipal Structures Act; the Municipal Systems Act; and the Municipal Planning and Performance Management Regulations. To a large extent, these documents provide for public participation at local government level inclusive of Ward committees.

1.3.1 Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act No. 108 of 1996

The Constitution as the supreme governing law of the country provides a basis for a democratic political system in the country. Among others, it envisages a system of local government where communities are given a stronger voice and participation in how their communities are governed. Chapter 7 (Section 152) stipulates that local government should, inter alia, provide democratic and accountable government for local communities, ensure the provision of services to communities in a sustainable manner, and encourage the involvement of communities and community organisations in matters of local government.

The above were elaborated further in the White Paper on Local Government as the process towards the establishment of Ward committees unfolded.

1.3.2 The White Paper on Local Government, 1998

To give effect to Chapter 7 of the Constitution, the White Paper on Local Government outlined a new vision for local government. It envisages a local government deeply rooted within communities. Accordingly, it challenges local government to be developmental and puts forth the following as a definition of developmental local government: “A local government committed to working with citizens and groups within the community to find sustainable ways to meet their social, economic and material needs and improve the quality of their lives”.

In keeping with the above definition, municipalities are encouraged to establish strategies and mechanisms including, but not limited to, participative planning, and to continuously engage with citizens, business and community groups. The White Paper further provides for the establishment of Ward committees and states that, “the central role of Ward committees is the facilitation of local community participation in decisions which affect the local community, the articulation of local community interests and the representation of these interests within the metropolitan government system”.

1.3.3 Municipal Structures Act, 1998

Flowing from the White Paper was the Municipal Structures Act, which is intended to regulate the internal systems, structures and office-bearers of municipalities. Section 19(3) states that,

... a municipal council must develop mechanisms to consult the community and community organisations in performing its functions and exercising its powers.

The functions and powers will, to a large extent, relate to decision-making on issues that affect the communities. Of note is Chapter 4 of the Act, which requires that municipalities establish Ward committees with the object of enhancing participatory democracy in local government. The Act places an obligation on the part of a municipality to make rules on how members of the Ward committees are to be elected and the frequency of its Ward committee meetings.

1.3.4 Municipal Systems Act, 2000

This Act differs from the Municipal Structures Act in that, when it comes to community participation it places a greater emphasis on the rights and duties of citizens with regard to municipal functions. These duties include their contributions towards the decision-making process of the municipality and receiving feedback in respect of decisions taken by council on issues affecting their rights. Of key importance is the requirement for the municipality to determine methods of ensuring that communities participate in the drafting of Integrated Development Plans (IDPs). Although the Act does not specifically refer to Ward committees, it is envisaged that the drafting of IDPs will follow a participatory process through Ward committees.

1.3.5 Municipal Planning and Performance Management Regulations

The Municipal Planning and Performance Regulations further entrench the issue of community participation, and state that, “in the absence of an appropriate municipal wide structure for community participation, a municipality must establish a forum that will enhance community participation”. Community participation will be in the form of engaging in the following activities:

- Drafting and implementation of the IDPs;
- Monitoring, measurement and review of the municipality’s performance in relation to the key performance indicators and performance targets set by the municipality;

The regulation further provides that:

- The forum referred to above be representative of the composition of the community and comprise people identified by the community through mechanisms established by the municipality;
- The municipality convenes regular meetings of the forum to:
  - discuss the process to be followed in drafting the integrated development plan;
  - consult on the content of the integrated development plan;
  - monitor the implementation of the integrated development plan;
  - discuss the development, implementation and review of the municipality’s performance management system; and
  - monitor the municipality’s performance in relation to the key performance indicators and performance targets set by the municipality.

This regulation seems to recognise that there are interest groups within the community and that these should be part of a consultative structure such as Ward committees. It further recognises that regular meetings be convened.

1.4 PROBLEM STATEMENT

Despite the transformation process that took place, the legislative framework provided, and the subsequent delimitation of wards, including the establishment of Ward committees in most municipalities, service delivery has not improved at local government level. A report released by the South African Institute of Race Relations in 2006 notes that,

... of the 284 local municipalities, 203 could not provide sanitation to 60% of their residents, 182 were unable to provide refuse removal to 60% of houses, 155 could not provide water for 60% of properties, 122 could not provide electricity to 60% of homes, 116 were unable to provide housing for 60% of their residents and 42 were unable to execute 50% of their functions (South African Survey 2004/2005: 551).

Four years after the release of that report, Mr Elroy Africa (the then Director General of the Department of Cooperative Governance and Traditional Affairs which oversees local municipalities) told a press briefing on 16 November 2010 that about 24 municipalities had failed to spend R920 million in the Municipal Infrastructure Grant (MIG) funds in the past municipal financial year ending 30 June 2010 (Majavu, 17/11/2011, writing in Sowetan, page 4). The money was for water, sanitation, roads, street-lights, parks and other basic services.

The challenge seems to be that Ward committees, having been established to facilitate public participation at local government level and subsequently support the management of development policy, are not as effective as they should be. In other words, participation in those committees has not attained the expected levels. Where it is at the level expected, participants do not appear to be adequately capacitated and do not understand their mandate. Studies conducted with regard to Ward committees in municipalities such as Msunduzi, Buffalo and Nelson Mandela have scratched the surface of this challenge and focused more on community participation. This study focuses not only on public participation but on determining the extent to which Ward committee members understand their mandate in respect of the management of development policy.

In addition, the study will analyze the organizational challenges faced by Ward committees in respect of managing development policy. These relate to, inter alia, capacity, participation, knowledge and information with regard to meeting their legislative functions and thus contributing to development and service delivery.

1.5 PURPOSE STATEMENT

The purpose of this research, with particular focus on the Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality is to firstly investigate factors leading to problems in respect of Ward committees; secondly, to present findings on local governance arising from questionnaires administered on Ward committee members and interviews conducted with selected ward councillors and the Speaker; thirdly, to interpret and analyse those findings, and finally to recommend strategies for consideration in relation to local governance and improvement of service delivery.

1.6 RESEARCH QUESTIONS

The research will attempt to answer the following questions:

- To what extent are Ward committee members participating in policy development, implementation and monitoring?
- To what extent are Ward committees capacitated to discharge their mandate?
- To what extent is the mandate of Ward committees understood by its members as well as municipal officials?

1.7 SIGNIFICANCE OF THE RESEARCH

The need to ensure that local government, which is the sphere of government closest to the people, responds adequately to the needs and aspirations of the people cannot be underestimated. This need is further reinforced by demands from communities that municipalities should deliver quality services. To meet this demand, institutions that support service delivery such as Ward committees have been established by municipalities. Despite that, municipalities face challenges such as the limited capacity of those committees and the degree of understanding demonstrated by participants.

Given the challenges, this research will present ways and means of how Ward committees can play a role in the management of development policy. It will also provide recommendations with regard to participation, the understanding of their mandate and how they could be capacitated.

1.8 CONCLUSION

Local government plays an important role in the provision of services to residents. This is widely recognised at the international level. Countries around the world have been through a process of decentralisation and subsequently devolved powers to local government. Of note is the recognition by countries such as Georgia, Panama, India, Mozambique, Benin, Mauritania and South Africa of the role played by constituencies and wards to the extent whereby constituencies and wards have been delineated.

In this chapter, some background to the evolution of local government was provided. This background touched on local government reform in South Africa citing the legislative frameworks governing such reform. It also highlighted service delivery challenges faced by local government in South Africa which increasingly lead to violent protests by communities.

CHAPTER TWO

LITERATURE REVIEW

2.1 INTRODUCTION

The provision of services by national, provincial and in particular local government has become a burning issue for residents in various municipalities. Of critical importance is the role played by institutions set up by government to promote public participation and thus ensure effective service delivery. Having a proper understanding of these institutions as well as what should constitute them, most importantly by those who serve in them, cannot be underestimated.

This chapter provides an overview of literature pertaining to Ward committees. It starts with the exposition of the theory of local governance focusing on governance, democratisation, civil society and participation. It further outlines the management of development policy, following with policy-making, implementation, monitoring and evaluation. This is followed by an overview of some South African cases of municipalities that adopted the Ward committee system.

2.2 LITERATURE REVIEW

Literature review is a process of obtaining and reading background information relevant to the research topic in order to conceive it in a way that permits a clear formulation of the problem and the hypothesis (Bless and Higson-Smith, 1995: 22). Neuman (2006: 124) states that, “doing literature review builds on the idea that knowledge accumulates and that we can learn from and build on what others have done”. He further outlines the goals of literature review which are to demonstrate a familiarity with a body of knowledge and establish credibility, show the path of prior research and how a current project is linked to it, integrate and summarise what is known in an area, to learn from others and stimulate new ideas. This provides the background for examining theory of local governance and/ or local governance.

2.3 THEORY OF LOCAL GOVERNANCE

Local governance comprises a set of institutions, mechanisms and processes through which citizens and their groups can articulate their interests and needs, mediate their differences and exercise their rights and obligations at the local level. The building blocks of good local governance are mainly citizen participation, partnerships among key actors at the local level, capacity of local actors across all sectors, multiple flows of information, institutions of accountability, and a pro-poor orientation (UNPD, 2004: 4). Before examining the theory of local governance, it will be prudent to define the concept “governance” This is deemed necessary in order to locate the building blocks referred to above within the literature.

2.3.1 Governance

Governance is defined as structures of political and economic relationships and rules by which the productive as well as distributive life of a society is governed (Leftwich, 1993: 611). Stated differently, it refers to political and economic structures with rules that regulate how a society is governed to improve its well-being. Hyden (1992: 7) defines governance along similar lines when he states that, “governance is the conscious management of regime structures with a view to enhancing the legitimacy of the public realm”.

Drawing on the above definitions, it can be concluded that governance should be concerned with how rules or structures affect political action and the prospect of solving societal problems. Governance exists when there is trust, reciprocity, accountability and authority. Trust is a normative consensus on the limits of action present in a political community. Reciprocity refers to the quality of social interaction among members of a political community. Accountability is the effectiveness with which the governed can exercise influence over their governors. Authority stresses the significance of effective political leadership (Hyden, 1992: 14).

In the light of the foregoing, governance should focus not only on how elected representatives make policies and choose tools for implementation but on processes that public managers, citizens and stakeholders use to influence policy development and implementation. Public managers should firstly manage complex networks. Secondly, they should rely more on inter-personal and inter-organisational processes. Thirdly, they should use information technology and performance management effectively. Fourthly, public managers should provide transparency and build human capital in terms of negotiation coupled with co-ordination skills; and finally they should provide channels for citizens to participate and supply bottom-up accountability to the public (Bingham, Nabatchi and O'Leary, 2005: 548).

Mhone (Mhone and Edigheji, 2003: 3) astutely defines governance as the manner in which the apparatus of the state is constituted, how it executes its mandate and its relationship to society in general and to particular constituencies such as the private sector, civil society, non-governmental organisations and community organisations, and how it fulfils the substantive aspects of democracy. Mhone (2000: 3) further touches on the concept of "good governance", observing that it, may be understood to have at least three aspects: first, the need for a rule-based, open, transparent, efficient and accountable government; second, the need for government to undertake its task in a manner that is participatory and consultative and that generally lives up to the democratic precepts of formal democracy; and, third for government or the state to ensure that substantive aspects of democracy are achieved, which would be compatible with the need to attain sustainable human development in the long term.

From this it can be assumed that governance is about the structure of government, how it relates to non-governmental institutions and how it executes its mandate within the context of democracy. This could be said to be the cornerstone of the theory of local governance and will thus guide this research report. Consequently, the concepts "democratisation", "civil society" and "participation" are defined.

2.3.2 Democratisation

Democratisation entails making a society, institution, organization or country democratic. Underpinning this is the concept, "democracy". Democracy refers to a system of government in which the ruling power of a state is legally vested, not in any particular population group or class, but in the people (Cloete, 1993: 4). Ranney (1990: 112) defines democracy as a form of government organized in accordance with the principles of popular sovereignty, political equality, popular consultation and majority rule.

Popular sovereignty requires that the ultimate power to make political decisions is vested in all the people rather than in some of them or one of them. Political equality requires that each adult citizen has the same opportunity as every other adult citizen to participate in the political decision-making process. Popular consultation requires two arrangements: firstly, that some institutional machinery, through which public officials learn what kind of public policies the people wish adopted and enforced, should exist; and secondly, that having ascertained the people's preferences, public officials should then put them into effect whether they approve or not. Majority rule requires that when people disagree on an issue, the government should act according to the wishes of the larger rather than the smaller number (Ranney, 1990: 112-115).

In both the above definitions, the common denominator is the "people". In other words, whatever decisions are made by the state, these should be based on the will of the people and not just a selected few. By the same token, implementation of government policies should take into account the wishes of the majority as opposed to the few. This notion is supported by Bevir (2006: 428) who brings an element of system governance and states that,

... it derives in part the communitarian idea that the effectiveness of political institutions depends on the incorporation of stakeholders within decision-making processes so as to secure a social consensus over values, policies and the legitimacy of the institutions themselves.

This requires not only representative democracy where citizens participate through an institutionalized process of voting for parties in periodic elections and by joining structured groups. It also requires participatory democracy where citizens are treated from a point of view of being agents capable of deliberating on any prescribed issue and making meaningful inputs with regard to policies.

In that context, the active participation of citizens in the management of policy, namely policy development, implementation, monitoring and evaluation, is paramount. Bevir (2006: 431) goes further by stating that,

“to promote participatory democracy that emphasizes deliberation and ethical conduct, we might seek to devolve aspects of governance to associations within civil society”.

2.3.3 Civil Society

Walzer in Chandhoke (2001: 4) speaks of civil society as the space of uncoerced human association. He defines it as the ‘setting of setting’ where people associate with each other on various grounds but notably for the sake of realising their natures as social beings. In other words, it is an association of people coming together to pursue a common goal.

Taylor, supported by Isaac in Chandhoke (2001: 5) looks at civil society as institutions existing outside of the state. The view is that of a third sphere with the state being the first and the market the second. In that context, Chandhoke (2001: 6) states that, “the idea of civil society thus embodies for many an ethical ideal of the social order, one that if not overcomes, at least harmonises the conflicting demands of individual interest and social good”. This could mean that civil society bridges the gap between individual interests and that of the state. This gap can be bridged with civil society assuming the role of a voluntary or non-profit sector acting outside the market and the state.

Similarly to Taylor, Jørgensen in Clayton (1996: 36) defines civil society as organised activities by groups or individuals either performing certain services or trying to influence and improve society as a whole, but that are not part of government or business. In other words, it is a grouping of individuals who come together to pursue a goal of improving the well-being of a society. As with Chandhoke (2001), Jørgensen indicates that civil society covers all voluntary constituted social relations, institutions and organisations that are not reducible to the administrative grasp of the state. Thus, the definition says that civil society is much broader than political debate and advocacy.

The summary provided by Chandhoke (2001) of civil society being thought of as a third sphere of political participation is echoed by Trivedy and Acharya in Clayton (1996: 57). They mention that, “advocates of the trinity framework generally define civil society through a principle of exclusion of that which is neither state nor market”. This is because the state is equated with coercion and domination whilst the market is equated with profit-making and competition. Civil society is therefore seen as the realm of citizens outside of those spheres.

The above exposition is supported by Putnam’s theory of civil society which states that civil society is a dense network of associations generating what he calls social capital. Social capital is any feature of social relations that contributes to the ability of society to work together and accomplish certain goals. There is a correlation between the density of social associations that manage to bridge social divides, the creation of civic culture and strong democracy (Chandhoke: 2001: 15).

In South Africa, the establishment of Ward committees could be seen as an attempt to bring together various civil society groupings with a view to bringing about a more structured relationship free of conflict between the state and communities. In other words, Ward committees have been created to occupy the space currently occupied by civil society. This is supported by the understanding that members of Ward committees are to be drawn from interest groups to foster participation. The following section takes the concept of civil society to greater heights by defining participation.

2.3.4 Participation

Participation is a wider term to be defined. For the purposes of this research report, the definition of “public participation” will be provided. It will be used interchangeably with “citizen participation”. This is intended to narrow the definitions and focus specifically on participation by the people in matters that affect their daily lives. Citizen participation is defined as the ways in which citizens exercise influence and control over the decisions that affect them (Devas and Grant, 2003: 309). For this to happen, the state should treat citizens not only as voters but as active participants in decision-making.

In the above context, ideal conditions for public participation have to exist. These relate to projects being beneficial to the entire community. Secondly, key stakeholders should not be geographically dispersed. Thirdly, citizens should have enough financial resources to enable them to attend meetings. Fourthly, community has to be homogenous to allow for speedy decision-making. Lastly, the topic to be discussed should not be technically complex (Irvin and Stansbury, 2004: 62). The above conditions have the potential of assisting citizen participation to produce better decisions and contribute to a more efficient provision of services. Unfortunately this is not always the case because in some instances citizen participation can be chaotic, stall decision-making and ultimately hinder development.

For better decisions to emerge through the participatory process, the careful selection of participants is important. This hinges on whether participants are appropriately representative of those they claim to represent. Thus a thorough stakeholder analysis focusing on their interests, strengths, assumptions and needs is crucial. In addition, the manner in which they (participants) communicate and also choose issues to be discussed is critical. Equally important are the methods of participation put in place by decision-makers.

2.3.4.1 Methods of participation

Methods of participation, if properly used, serve as good tools that allow citizens to meaningfully make input into decisions to be taken. Adams (2004: 43-44) identifies five methods of participation, namely citizen juries, round-tables, electronic town meetings, public meetings and surveys.

A citizen jury is a group of randomly selected and geographically representative panel of citizens that meets over a period of four or five days to deliberate on an issue of public interest and significance (Citizen Jury Handbook, 2004: 3). The guiding principles are that it has to be representative, informed and impartial. The purpose is to provide on the one hand an opportunity for decision-makers to hear thoughtful citizen inputs. On the other hand, it enables citizens to have an understanding about an issue, engage in joint deliberation and come up with well informed solutions. In South Africa, citizen juries could be likened to Ward committees even though the selection thereof is not the same. Ward committee members are nominated by various interest groups they represent in the community and go through an election process to represent various interest groups.

Round-tables are a method of participation where there is no “head” and no “sides” and thus no person can claim to be having an advantage or be privileged over others. This type of method is usually used in conferences involving many parties. Parties attend to present the views of their members with an intention of influencing the outcome of deliberations. Although the objectives of a party attending will be to extract concessions from other parties, the guiding principle is to reach consensus. An example of this within the South African context is the Multiparty Negotiations of 1993 that gave birth to the current democratic government. Similarly, Ward committees endeavour to reach consensus on development and service delivery issues within the community.

Electronic town meetings entail a public planning and participation process which utilizes technology to reach as many people as possible. They could be a televised programme whereby viewers phone in and ask questions of public representatives. They could also refer to live debates where public representatives debate against each other with viewers given an opportunity to ask questions and also comment. In some instances, telephone numbers are flashed on the screen and viewers are invited to vote on an issue. While these are valid forms of electronic dialogue, there are two basic requirements to be met (Elgin, 1993: 9). Firstly, citizens and decision-makers must be able to obtain accurate feedback regarding public sentiments. Secondly, feedback must be fast enough to enable citizens to give more than a single response to an issue under discussion. This method could be problematic or inaccessible for Ward committees, given the level of development in South Africa because not everyone, especially in poorer communities, has access to the type of technology alluded to.

Public meetings are a convergence of citizens in one venue to convey information to officials, influence public opinion, attract media attention, set future agendas, delay decisions and communicate with other citizens (Adams, 2004: 43). They play the role of soliciting responsiveness and accountability on the part of government and maintaining a democratic system. However, what is critical is attendance of participants at those meetings. A high turnout would signify popular support for the issue under discussion. On the contrary, a poor turnout would raise questions regarding the legitimacy of a decision made. Thus, public meetings provide citizens with power to mobilize for or against a particular decision. Ward committee members as well as municipalities utilise this method quite often to get the views of the community and also provide feedback.

Surveys are used to gather first-hand information or views of citizens about a particular issue. Although they are important mechanisms to gather information, they are not always successful in effecting meaningful participation. The reasons relate to the costs of administering them, the communication gap between those surveying and surveyed, language and cultural barriers, and the tendency by the interviewee to provide information required by the interviewer and not genuine facts.

2.3.4.2 Means of participation

The means of participation enables citizens as a collective to be in a more favourable position of influencing government decisions than as individuals. Bekker (1996: 29) identifies interest and pressure groups as means of participation. Interest groups are all groups which seek to influence public policy in their own chosen direction, without accepting responsibility for government (Ehrman in Bekker, 1996: 30). Pressure groups are any organization that endeavours to influence the policies of government without accepting responsibility for public office (Wootton in Bekker, 1996: 30). Flowing from this, it can be seen that interest and pressure groups are synonymous. These could be likened to civil society which had been defined earlier.

Another means of participation is through the utilization of extension staff. They provide a link between those making policies and citizens who are to be affected by those policies. The link may also have a more general nature, in that information about local needs and conditions can be communicated to local authorities and information about local government policies and programmes to the people (Brynard in Bekker, 1996: 138). In the South African language, with particular reference to local government, extension staff could be said to refer to Community Development Workers (CDWs). They are special public servants who engage with citizens and determine what services are needed, to ensure that these services are made available. CDWs link communities with a plethora of government services and programmes. This is seen as a means of capacitating Ward committees on issues of development and service delivery.

The means of participation outlined above lead to the types of relationships that shape the patterns of participation pursued by decision-makers. The following section provides an exposition of patterns of participation.

2.3.4.3 Patterns of participation

Patterns of participation are premised around the type of relationship that must exist between public officials and citizens. Susskind and Elliot (1983: 5-6) mentions three such patterns that were observed in Western Europe as public participation evolved. These are paternalism, conflict and co-production.

Paternalism is when decision-making is highly centralised and advice from citizens is either discouraged or closely managed by government officials. In other words, public officials tend to micro-manage citizen participation. Conflict is the pattern of participation where decision-making is centralised with citizens struggling openly to wrest control over resource allocation or policy decisions from decision-makers. This is observable in South Africa where citizens openly challenge the status quo or policies taken. The challenges quite often lead to violent confrontation with the authorities.

Co-production is when decisions are made through face-to-face negotiation between decision-makers and citizens claiming a major stake in particular decisions. Similarly to Susskind and Elliot (1983), Cooper, Bryer and Meek (2006: 82) brings an element of deliberative approaches to citizen participation. They state that, “deliberative approaches include efforts that seek joint action across sectors of society, classes of people or types of individuals”. Put differently, they entail joint decision-making between public officials and citizens as they seek ways of delivering services to communities. The glue that keeps this relationship intact is government trust in citizens, citizen efficacy, and trust in government, citizen competence, government responsiveness, and legitimacy. Ward committees seem to be established with this pattern of participation in mind. What is important is the extent to which this approach is not misunderstood to mean co-option and what role they play in the management of development policy.

2.4 MANAGING DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Public institutions by their very nature undertake activities to produce or provide goods and services. The undertaking of such activities requires the formulation of policies. To this effect, the management of policies from the point of view of formulation, implementation, monitoring and evaluation is critical.

This section is not intended to dissect in detail development policy, policy formulation or policy-making, implementation, monitoring or evaluation. It is intended to provide a broad overview of those concepts with a view to indicate at a later stage the role Ward committees can play in their actualisation.

2.4.1 Development policy

Development policy refers to deliberate action by public institutions seeking to promote development (Mackintosh in Wuyts, Mackintosh and Hewitt, 1992: 1). Deliberate actions are normally articulated in policies that are adopted by public institutions. Policies are purposive actions undertaken by the state (governments and their employees) or by other institutions (such as voluntary organisations) with an avowedly public purpose (Mackintosh in Wuyts, Mackintosh and Hewitt, 1992: 2).

The above author cites two models of development policy, namely policy as social process and as prescription. As social process, the underlying factor is that policy ideas are pursued when institutions to put them into practice are available. As a prescription, the identification of what government should do and how to do it is done. Questions are asked in terms of what worked or did not work, with the aim of extracting models and lessons from evidence of success. To respond to those questions, a great deal of information is required. Such information is gathered when policies are made, implemented and continuously assessed. This can be linked to the concepts of, “policy-making, policy implementation and policy monitoring and evaluation”.

2.4.2 Policy-making

Policy-making, sometimes referred to by other authors as policy formulation, is defined as the development and synthesis of alternative solutions for policy problems (Fox and Meyer, 1996: 97). In policy-making, various theories and models are applied. De Coning and Cloete as quoted in Cloete and Wissink (2000: 25) states that, “as with definitions, grand theories of policy-making do not exist”. They define some of the theories designed by authors to explain policy-making processes, namely classical, liberal democratic, elite and systems theories.

Classical theory emphasises that the different concerns and interests of government should be given preference. In liberal democratic theory, the political party assumes the position of primary force in policy-making. With elite theory, a small elite group leads a large group of followers in policy-making. Systems theory focuses on the contributions of interrelated forces to policy-making (De Coning and Cloete in Cloete and Wissink, 2000: 26-27). This could explain why in some instances, various interest groups in South Africa which could prefer systems theory approach challenge both the ruling party and government with regard to policy-making. It could also explain the establishment of Ward committees at local level as vehicles to breach the gap between government, civil society and communities and thus pursue a particular theory, in that case, systems theory.

2.4.3 Policy implementation

Van Meter and Van Horn in Cloete, Wissink and de Coning (2000: 183) defines policy implementation as encompassing those actions by public or private individuals or groups that are directed at the achievement of objectives set forth in prior policy decisions. Policy implementation should not be seen as simple and straightforward. Brynard in Cloete, Wissink and de Coning (2006: 166) states that, “scholars have in fact done much to highlight the complexity of the importance of process and the importance of trying to understand this complexity”. In this context, he raises the big debate between top-down and bottom-up approaches to policy implementation.

Top-down approach moves from the authoritative policy position at central government and cascades downward, with the following questions being asked:

- To what extent were the actions of implementers and target groups consistent with policy decisions?
- To what extent were objectives attained over time?
- What were the principal factors affecting policy outputs and impacts?
- How was the policy reformulated over time on the basis of experience? (Brynard in Cloete, Wissink and de Coning, 2006: 169)

Bottom-up approach was developed in response to the top-down approach. In challenging the bottom-up approach, Rein and Rabinowitz as cited by Brynard proposes the, “principle of circularity”. This is further built upon by Nakamura and Smallwood in Brynard, who suggests the implementation process as a system of functional environments, each of which contains a variety of actors and arenas and is connected to the others by various communication and compliance linkages.

Without undermining the differences that exist between scholars of those two approaches, there are areas where there is commonality. The commonality relates to a general acceptance that implementation is a complex process, involving various levels or organs and actors influenced by the environment within which it (implementation) is taking place. With this in mind, Ward committees could be seen as important organs for policy implementation. This is because they are representative of various interest groups in a community.

2.4.4 Policy monitoring and evaluation

Policy monitoring and evaluation will be defined focusing on the two concepts of “monitoring” and “evaluation”. This is because whether the concepts are applied to policies, programmes or projects, the definitions are more or less the same. Monitoring refers to the periodic re-measurement of appropriate parameters to determine the effects of particular management strategies or policies and the response of systems to changes in the wider environment (Bosch, 1996: 12). In essence, it is an assessment of how a project or programme is being implemented, the extent to which programme objectives are met, and the nature of failures that need to be responded to.

Evaluation refers to an activity designed to judge the merits of government programmes or processes (Jones, 184: 199). It is a process through which policy makers determine whether the stated goals are achieved, what the cost implications are as well as intended and unintended consequences. This is reinforced by Shafritz in Cloete and Wissink (2000:211) who states that, “evaluation determines the value or effectiveness of an activity for the purpose of decision-making”.

Dye (2002), in the same literature, states that, “programme evaluation consists of the systematic description and judgements of programmes and to the extent feasible, systematic assessment of the extent to which they have the intended results”. Cloete in Cloete and Wissink (2000: 211) could be seen to be providing a summary of the above statements when he states that, “in its ideal form, policy evaluation or assessment should be viewed as a judging process to compare explicit and implicit policy objectives with real or projected outcomes or results or impacts”.

Drawing on the above definitions, it is clear that the continuous shaping of policies from the point of view of formulation and implementation is derived in part from the end products of those concepts. In this context, Ward committee members as representatives of people directly affected by policies implemented at a ward level can play a critical role in the monitoring and evaluation of policy implementation. This role will be examined through the analysis of some South African cases.

2.5 SOUTH AFRICAN CASES

Local government, and in particular Ward committees, has aroused a great deal of research interest to establish Ward committees relate to governance structures of municipalities and also how they execute their monitoring and evaluation function. Most of these focus on communication and public participation while a few focus on their functioning. Five cases are cited in this regard.

The first looks at public participation in the integrated development planning processes of local government in Pretoria. The second is an overview of the Ward committee system in the Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality (Raga and Taylor, 2005: 244-254). The third is an assessment of, “participatory governance” in local government focusing on two cities, namely Msunduzi (Pietermaritzburg) and Buffalo (East London) (Barichievy, Piper and Parker, 2005: 370-393). The fourth is a critical evaluation of the role of Ward committees in enhancing public participation in Rustenburg Municipality (Putu, 2006). The fifth one is a study seeking to understand how well Ward committees are working and whether representation is inclusive and meaningful (Smith, 2008). These studies are of importance in gaining an insight into the functioning and progress of Ward committees in entrenching democracy, participation and governance over the years. They lay a foundation upon which this research will attempt to further elaborate on issues facing Ward committees.

2.5.1 Public participation in the integrated development planning (IDP) processes of local government in Pretoria

An evaluation into the participation of organs of civil society in the IDP process in Pretoria was published by the Human Sciences Research Council (HSRC) in 2001. This evaluation aimed to explore the experiences of officials of the then Pretoria City Council in developing participatory governance for its IDP process, and solicit the views of key civil society participants towards the participatory process as used to develop IDPs in Pretoria from 1996 onwards.

The findings of that evaluation were that almost all respondents felt that the IDP process enabled citizens to play a role in the planning process. In other words, it allowed citizens who are affected by decisions of the Council to express a view in respect of those decisions.

Notwithstanding, the following problems in respect of the process were raised:

- IDP reports were not given adequate consideration by the City Council;
- There was limited participation of councillors in the process;
- Conflict between community structures and councillors was experienced;
- There was insecurity about the future of the IDP process, in particular in relation to planning zone forums;
- Resources were lacking for the community participation process and the implementation of IDP projects;
- Community participation in the process was limited;
- The process was dominated by a small number of individuals or a particular sector such as consultants or developers; and
- There was a high prevalence of self-interest in the planning process.

The above problems arose at the time when Ward committees were not in existence. It will be important to establish whether those problems are still prevalent.

2.5.2 An overview of the Ward committee system: A case study of the Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality.

A survey involving certain Ward committees was conducted in 2003 to determine what needs existed for the empowerment of such committees in order to significantly influence the decision-making process of the Municipality. The following results emerged.

- Ward committee members were aware of the additional developmental responsibilities imposed on the municipality in terms of the new developmental mandate;
- Legislative prescriptions pertaining to the functions and duties of Ward committees were generally understood by committee members;
- The majority of Ward committee members interviewed reported that they were not functioning well with their respective ward councillor on policy matters;
- A high percentage of respondents reported that insufficient meetings in order to keep all parties informed of local issues were called by ward councillors;
- Committee members felt that the Ward committee system in the municipality was not functioning as envisaged because certain members, including ward councillors, did not attend meetings regularly;
- Most of the respondents felt that Ward committees did not enjoy sufficient decision-making powers;
- The majority of the respondents stated that their Ward committees did not influence the policy-making process in local government;
- Most of the respondents felt that Ward committees did not have sufficient delegated powers to influence the policy-making process;
- Respondents felt that giving Ward committees greater policy-making powers would enhance participatory democracy and help speed up the process of service delivery;
- The policy-making process in local government was generally understood by members of Ward committees; and
- All respondents stated that Ward committee members should receive regular training in local government matters in order to be more effective in influencing policy-making.

Drawing from the above, it would appear that the results are prompted by lack of capacity in respect of Ward committees and to some extent the misunderstanding of its mandate. This will be tested as to whether it can be attributed to the Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality as well.

2.5.3 Assessing ‘participatory governance’ in local government: A case study of two South African cities

The study focused on two South African cities: Msunduzi (Pietermaritzburg) and Buffalo (East London), with the intention of answering the question, “Does participatory governance actually deepen democracy?” This was deemed important in that the Municipal Systems Act highlights the importance of participatory governance through a term referred to as community participation. Although as reported in the case that there was insufficient data, the findings were as follows:

- Ward committees did not involve large numbers of residents in council decision-making;
- In both municipalities, Ward committees performed poorly and participation in law and policy-making was generally low;
- The respondents felt that Ward committees were toothless in that they play only advisory roles rather than being representative bodies independent of the ward councillor; and
- There appeared to be a lack of correspondence between the degree of public participation in council processes and the internal democratic operation.

2.5.4 The role of Ward committees in enhancing public participation in Rustenburg Municipality: A critical evaluation

This study investigated the paradigm shift in democratic governance and the role of Ward committees towards enhancing community participation in the process of governance. The study reveals the following in respect of Ward committees:

- The culture of democratic practice was new and people did not know how to constructively engage with local government including Ward committees;
- Many Ward committee members had very poor educational qualifications and found it difficult to contribute to the discussions;
- As Ward committees are chaired by ward councillors, in many cases conflict ensued due to the fact that the ward councillors wanted to satisfy their political mandate rather than improving the lives of citizens;

- The high level of unemployment contributed to high expectations of remuneration and employment for Ward committee members;
- Capacity building in respect of Ward committee members did not take place on the scale necessary to realise meaningful participation;
- A number of professional people in the area did not participate in community issues; and
- Friction was experienced between ward councillors, Ward committee members and traditional leaders as a result of their decision-making powers being taken away and given to ward councillors and Ward committees.

2.5.5 Are Ward committees working? Insights from six case studies

This study sought to understand how Ward committees are functioning and whether their representation is inclusive of the broader communities and is meaningful. Six Ward committees, two each from three municipalities, were chosen. The names and identifying features of the municipalities in the report were held to ensure anonymity. They were chosen based on the category of the municipality, size in terms of the number of wards, and whether it is urban or rural. The following were the findings:

2.5.5.1 Profile

Four of the six committees had their full complement of ten members as required by law. Representation in respect of men and women appears to be even. Most of the committees surveyed consist of only black people with one having seven white and two Indian members. The age of members ranges between 26 and 50 with only five members aged just under 25. In most cases, the majority of members are unemployed and most have a matriculation qualification.

2.5.5.2 Roles and expectations

In this study, Ward committee members had a reasonable understanding of the role which they have to play in respect of local governance. They see their role as that of bridging the communication gap between the community and municipality via the ward councillor. Communities also view Ward committees as a structure that should shoulder the responsibility of service delivery.

2.5.5.3 Nomination and election process

Nomination and election processes appears to have functioned well in line with the national guidelines. There is only one municipality where the process appeared to have been flawed and politicised.

2.5.5.4 Representation

Representation of key sectors in most cases appears to be insufficient despite attempts to ensure inclusivity of key sectors and geographical areas. Part of the problem seems to be that Ward committees lack the skills to effectively consult their wider sectoral communities.

2.5.5.5 Functioning

Of the six Ward committees sampled, only two are functioning as they should be, implying that there are regular meetings held and a prevailing sense of common purpose. Despite some committees meeting as often as monthly, it is not clear as to the actual value of those meetings. The malfunctioning of the committees was attributed to lack of training.

2.5.5.6 Influence on council decision-making

One discouraging finding reported is the lesser role played by Ward committees in respect of influencing council decisions. This was attributed to the lack of a structured mechanism to solicit inputs from Ward committees to the Council's policy processes. The assumption is that inputs are submitted to the ward councillor who in turn submits to the relevant portfolio committee or the Speaker's Office to be placed on the Council's agenda.

2.5.5.7 Support and resources

One other finding was the need to capacitate Ward committees from the point of view of training, providing resources such as stationery, transport and catering, as well as allowance or stipend for committee members. Only one municipality was providing stipends while two others plan to do so.

2.5.5.8 Relationships

In general, Ward committees seem to have good relationships with ward councillors except in one where there appears to have been a complete breakdown of the relationship. The level of support from ward councillors seemed to be satisfying insofar as committee members were concerned. In addition, the relationship with other parties, notably officials, community development workers and traditional leaders was reported to be good.

2.6 CONCLUSION

Local government has evolved over time to give effect to the constitutional requirement of enhancing participation at community level. Underpinning this are the concepts of “governance, democratisation, civil society and participation”. The sum total of these concepts could be regarded as forming the basis of the theory of local governance. In this regard, pieces of legislation providing institutional mechanisms such as Ward committees have been enacted by Parliament. The objective is to ensure that communities play a meaningful role in respect of the management of development policy and actualise the theory of local governance.

Despite the above, the level of development of Ward committees differs from one municipality to another. More importantly is the extent to which their mandate is understood by members and municipal officials. This, as reflected in the cited South African cases, leads to tensions between ward councillors and committee members, with the former perceiving the latter as taking away his/her powers and functions.

CHAPTER THREE

RESEARCH FRAMEWORK

3.1 INTRODUCTION

While the literature on research framework is extensive, the gist thereof is that well-articulated and properly planned research is widely accepted. By so doing, a process that assesses evidence seeking answers on questions around aspects of analysing and interpreting research is outlined. Without this, the research exercise is not likely to yield good results.

This chapter provides the research framework that guided the research. It starts by examining the research methodology. This is followed by all aspects of research, namely sample, research approach, design, techniques and planning. The structure of the report is also outlined. It concludes by providing an overview of data analysis touching on, among others, validity, reliability and ethics.

3.2 RESEARCH METHODOLOGY

Research methodology consists of the systematic, methodological and accurate execution of the research design. It focuses on the research process and the tools and procedures to be used (Mouton: 2001: 55-56). The research undertaken on selected Ward committees in Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality is intended to firstly establish the extent to which Ward committee members participate in policy development, implementation and monitoring; secondly, how Ward committees are capacitated to discharge their mandate; and thirdly, whether their mandate was understood or not. This was done taking into account the requirements of the Municipal Structures Act and the Municipal Systems Act. Underpinning this is the view of Burt et al., (1997: 61) who states that, “a good process analysis design is guided by a set of core questions which are that the project model is implemented as specified, whether the programme has unintended consequences and unanticipated outcomes or not and what the view of staff, participants and community is on the project”.

The following section outlines how a sample of Ward committees to be evaluated was obtained.

3.3 SAMPLE

A sample is a subset of the whole population which is actually investigated by a researcher and whose characteristics are generalised to the entire population. It is obtained through the guidance of sampling theory which is a technical accounting device to rationalise the collection of information, choose in an appropriate way the restricted set of objects, persons, events and so forth from which the actual information is drawn (Bless and Higson-Smith, 1995: 85). Seventy-six Ward committees of Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality before the current municipal realignment were categorized into two groups: those that were hit by service delivery protests and those who were not.

Following the categorization of Ward committees, one from each group was randomly selected to constitute units of analysis. Notwithstanding the categorization of Ward committees, the research methods used to collect data, which are outlined below, played an important role.

3.4 RESEARCH APPROACH

The approach used to collect data was based on both quantitative and qualitative research methods.

3.4.1 Quantitative methodology

Data collected using the quantitative method was in the form of responses to closed ended questions. These were converted to represent values of variables which measured the characteristics of Ward committee members. The idea was to determine firstly, the extent to which members participate in policy development, implementation and monitoring; secondly, the number of those who have been capacitated; and thirdly, the extent to which members understand their mandate.

The responses obtained from the above were systematically reorganized into a format readable by computers and analysed using descriptive statistics which describe numerical data. In that instance, frequency distribution which is easy to use and can be utilised in many forms, such as in raw count or graphical representation, was applied.

3.4.2. Qualitative methodology

Data collected using qualitative methodology are in the form of text, written words, phrases or symbols describing or representing people, actions and events in social life (Neuman, 2006: 457). Using this method with regard to Ward committees in Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality, the aim was to obtain an in-depth overview of Ward committees and their operations rather than the extent of understanding. Underpinning this was to extend the research to Ward Councillors and the Speaker. The research was thus bound by the themes of participation, capacity and mandate.

As with quantitative method, coding was also used, albeit differently. Three types of coding, namely open, axial and selective, were applied. Open coding is a first stage of coding qualitative data in which a researcher examines the data to condense them into preliminary analytic categories or codes. Axial coding is a second stage in which a researcher organizes the codes, links them and discovers key analytic categories. Selective coding is the last stage in which a researcher examines previous codes to identify and select data that will support the conceptual coding categories that were developed (Neuman, 2006: 461- 464). After this exercise, themes were identified along the lines of participation, capacity of Ward committees, and the understanding of their mandate.

3.5 RESEARCH DESIGN

Bless and Higson-Smith (1995: 63) describes research design as a programme to guide the researcher in collecting, analyzing and interpreting observed facts. They state that, “several fundamental questions relating to the focus, unit of analysis and time dimension of the problem at hand need to be answered”. Focus is understood in terms of conditions, orientation and actions. Conditions explore the current state of the subjects, orientation is concerned with attitudes and beliefs of subjects, while actions take into account the behaviour of subjects or what they do.

A unit of analysis is the person or object from which data is collected. This can take the form of individuals, groups or organisations. In respect of individuals, the researcher studies the conditions, orientations or actions of a group of individual people. In a group, individuals are brought together to constitute an area of focus. Organisations are an entity with a formal structure and questions of interest might relate to, inter alia, a proportion of employees from a particular group. In the case of the research in question, the units of analysis were Ward committees as groups and members as individuals.

Time dimension relates to the time when the study is conducted. Bless and Higson-Smith (1995: 66-67) states that when all data is collected at the same time, the design is cross-sectional. Longitudinal designs distribute data collection over time. In other words, it focuses on the time series. For the purposes of the research in respect of Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality, a cross-sectional design was adopted and data collected at the same time. This is because similar research has not been conducted previously and thus longitudinal design would have been inappropriate.

3.6 RESEARCH TECHNIQUES

The techniques to be applied in respect of data collection will take into account both the quantitative and qualitative methods that were used. Insofar as quantitative method is concerned, data from records held by the municipality were scrutinised to identify functional and dysfunctional Ward committees. In addition, questionnaires with specific items to which committee members were to respond were distributed. Structured questions focusing on research questions were administered for that purpose. These gave a choice of responses or guidelines on the procedure to be followed.

With regard to qualitative method, semi-structured interviews with the Speaker and Ward Councillors were conducted. Interviews are called “semi-structured” in that respondents were allowed to give long, detailed and complex responses. The idea was to get more information around the themes and also enrich the responses from questionnaires.

3.7 RESEARCH PLANNING

Seeing that data was collected from various respondents, interviews and questionnaires were structured in advance around a set of research questions indicated earlier. Attention was paid to defining objectives, issues, criteria, available information and drawing up a timetable.

The above were done through constant interaction between a dedicated municipal official, Ward Councillors, the Speaker and the researcher. This approach was critical to ensure that there is buy-in from the side of the municipality. It also assisted in gaining greater commitment from the respondents to participate in the research.

Thereafter a survey of available legislation as well as other additional documents received was done. As a quality assurance measure, a questionnaire together with interview schedule was administered to colleagues to eliminate ambiguity. Thereafter the research was rolled out and the questionnaires were distributed among all members of the two Ward committees. Interviews with relevant Ward Councillors followed. Data was then captured on a computer and write-up done.

Following the above, an analysis of data using quantitative and qualitative data analysis methods mentioned was undertaken. The purpose was to present findings as well as conclusions that could be drawn.

3.8 STRUCTURE OF THE REPORT

The report consists of six chapters: Introduction, Literature review, Research framework, Data presentation, Interpretation of results as well as Summary and recommendations. Chapter One, the introduction, provides an overview of the research itself touching on background, research problem and research questions.

Literature review in chapter two examines the concept of “local governance” focusing on governance, democratisation, civil society and participation. It also defines management of development policy and provides a summary of some South African cases of municipalities that adopted the Ward committee system. This is intended to determine whether findings from this research study are common or not.

The research framework is addressed in chapter three and focuses on how the study is to be conducted. It outlines the research objectives, sample, research methods, design, techniques and planning. It also explains the limitations.

Chapter four addresses the findings arising out of questionnaires administered and interviews conducted, while the interpretation of results in chapter five links the data presented to the literature review chapter. In essence, it highlights the gaps between the real and ideal situation.

Chapter six provides the summary and recommendations and highlights what has been deduced with regard to the themes, participation, mandate and capacity. It concludes by providing recommendations on how development policy can be managed through the Ward committee system in Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality.

3.9 DATA ANALYSIS

Bless and Higson-Smith (1995: 143) states that, “once data has been completed, a statistical analysis is performed in order to infer some properties of the population from sample results”. This exercise is called data analysis. It involves breaking up the data into manageable themes, patterns, trends and relationships. The aim is to understand various constitutive elements of one’s data through an inspection of the relationships between concepts, constructs or variables and to see whether there are any patterns or trends that can be identified or isolated, or to establish themes in the data (Mouton, 2001: 108).

In analysing data, issues of reliability and validity come into play. Reliability refers to the extent to which the observable (or empirical) measures that represent a theoretical concept are accurate and stable when used for the concept in several studies (Bless and Higson-Smith, 1995: 129). Leedy and Ormrod (2001: 31) defines reliability as the consistency with which a measuring instrument yields a certain result when the entity being measured has not changed.

Drawing from the above definitions, it can be inferred that reliability is concerned with how consistent the measures are. On the other hand, validity is concerned with just how accurately the observable measures actually represent the concept in question or whether in fact they represent something else (Bless and Higson-Smith, 1995: 129). In other words, it is about whether what is measured is indeed what is being measured.

In addition to reliability and validity, the issue of ethics should not be underestimated. This is because it plays a crucial role in the conduct of the researcher. Ethics refers to the range of moral and immoral choices and the construction of bonds within any community. Ethical researchers should not:

- Plagiarise or claim credit for the results of others;
- Misreport sources or invent results;
- Submit data whose accuracy they have reason to question, unless they raise the questions;
- Caricature or distort opposing views;
- Destroy or conceal sources and data important for those who follow (Booth, Colomb and Williams, 2003: 285-286).

Bless and Higson-Smith (1995: 102-103) states that, generally accepted ethical rights of participants which a social scientist should respect entail privacy or voluntary participation, anonymity, confidentiality and the special case of action research. Privacy or voluntary participation means that participants must volunteer and be allowed to withhold certain information about themselves. Anonymity means that participants should be allowed to divulge information of a private nature on condition that their names are not mentioned. Confidentiality means that information given should be used for the stated purpose of the research and that no other person should have access to it. The special case of action research means that the problem being researched should be the one raised by the community or should be a particular problem facing the community at the time.

3.10 LIMITATIONS OF THE RESEARCH

Although the issues of fear of councillors and party officials because of the challenges that faced the ruling party then, as well as transport challenges, were identified earlier as being those that could limit the research, the questionnaire was administered before the start of Ward committee meetings. The relationship between respondents, councillors and officials was highly cordial to an extent that there was no fear of responding to questions. The only limitation was with regard to language. This was overcome by having to explain the questionnaires in detail.

3.11 CONCLUSION

Research framework is an important component of a research exercise. As with many disciplines, researchers recognise the importance of a well thought out research plan which outlines how research is to be undertaken.

This chapter explained how the research was conducted. It defined the research methodology and the determination of a sample coupled with research approach and design. This was followed by limitations which impacted on the study itself.

CHAPTER FOUR

PRESENTATION OF THE DATA

4.1 INTRODUCTION

Data presentation plays an integral role in research and involves showing the workings of data. This is because the best experiments and logical arguments depend on the presentation of data to communicate the reason or rationale for the research. In other words, it intends to get the message through to the target audience.

This chapter focuses on presenting data obtained both from questionnaires administered to Ward committee members and interviews conducted with a sample of Ward Councillors including the Speaker within the City of Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality. It starts by providing an overview of the municipality in terms of how it is structured. This is followed by survey and interview responses sorted into three themes: participation, mandate and capacity.

4.2 OVERVIEW OF TSHWANE METROPOLITAN MUNICIPALITY

The City of Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality is an organ of state as provided for in Chapter 7 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 as amended. Its area of jurisdiction has been determined in terms of the Local Government: Municipal Demarcation Act 27 of 1998 as well as Cross-boundary Municipalities Laws Repeal and Related Matters Act 23 of 2005. Prior to Local Government elections of 2011, it comprised 76 wards and was divided into five administrative regions: Southern, North West, Central, North East and Eastern. The region executes the following core functions of the municipality:

- Regional planning, strategy implementation and monitoring;
- Housing implementation;
- Health and social development implementation;
- Sports, recreation, arts and culture;

- Environmental management; and
- Customer care.

In addition, each region provides support and corporate support services structures for the Ward Councillor and Ward committee (TIDP, 2006-2011, Third Revision). Thus, the relationship between the Ward Councillor, Ward committee and municipal officials is crucial to ensure a stable environment within which policy development, implementation, monitoring and evaluation is to take place. In this context and for the purposes of this research report, 2 wards were randomly selected and questionnaires distributed to 20 Ward committee members, of which 13 were returned, giving a response rate of 65%. In addition, 11 Ward Councillors including the Speaker were interviewed. The following section provides the responses to the survey.

4.3 SURVEY RESPONSES

Survey respondents were asked to provide their profiles focusing on gender, age, education level and organisations they represent.

4.3.1 Profile of respondents

Gender

Of the 13 respondents who returned their questionnaires, only a few are females as opposed to males who constitute almost 80%. Figure 1 below provides a representation of the respondents by gender.

Age

The questionnaire respondents were asked to indicate in which category their ages fall. Figure 2 below indicates that there is generally a fair combination of both youth and adult population (77%) within the Ward committees. The rest of the respondents (23%) are aged 50 years and above.

Education

The results from the questionnaire indicates that more than two-thirds (69%) of the respondents have an education level that ranges from standard 6 to Matric. Table 1 below outlines the number of respondents and percentage per education level.

Table 1: Education level

Education level	Count	Percentage
None - Standard 5	2	15%
Standard 6 - Standard 9	5	38%
Matric	4	31%
Certificates and National Diploma	2	15%
Grand Total	13	100%

Representation

All members who responded to the questionnaire belonged to various organisations ranging from political parties, which should not be the case to other committees such as health, education, Community Policing Fora and section committees. Table 2 below indicates representation.

Table 2: Representation

Organisation	Count	Percentage
Political Party	1	8%
Youth Formation	2	17%
Religious Group	2	17%
Business Community	1	8%

4.3.2 Participation

With regard to participation, questions regarding the regularity of meetings, Ward committee members making inputs at those meetings, being consulted on ward or community matters, being provided with a year planner of meetings and being given an opportunity to advise the Ward Councillor were asked.

Responding to the question on the regularity of meetings of the Ward committees, the respondents indicated that meetings take place regularly. Of the 13 respondents, 92% said meetings take place monthly while 8% said not at all. Coupled with this are 62% of those who said they made inputs monthly, 15% said fortnightly and another 15% said as and when needed. The same pattern emerges with regard to the regularity of being consulted on ward or community matters. The regularity of meetings and consultation as well as making input into meetings is done irrespective of whether the yearly calendar of meetings has been made available. This is true because 54% said the yearly calendar was distributed while 46% said not.

With the above in mind, the response of Ward committee members to the question of whether they are given an opportunity to advise the Ward Councillor or Council on issues affecting the ward or community was 31% strongly agreeing; 54% agreeing; and 1% each disagreeing and strongly disagreeing.

4.3.3 Capacity

With regard to capacity and in particular training, the following were areas of focus; assessment of training needs, training offered by the municipality and attendance of training programmes. Of the 13 respondents, 77% indicated that their training needs were assessed while 23% said not. Furthermore, 92% indicated that the municipality offered training while 8% said not. On the part of attendance; 77% attended training once while 23% attended more than once. Tables 3, 4 and 5 below depict the above scenario.

Table 3: Training needs assessment

Once	10	77%
Twice	2	15%

When looking at the provision of information by the municipality, 85% responded in the affirmative while 8% were both in disagreement and neutral, as depicted in Table 6 below.

Information provided	Count	Percentage

Agree	7	54%
Neutral	1	8%
Disagree	1	8%

4.3.4 Mandate

One aspect of mandate is the extent to which issues are clarified to Ward committee members. On the question of the Ward Councillor clarifying issues to be discussed; 85% of the 13 respondents either agreed or strongly agreed. Table 7 below presents the responses.

Table 7: Clarity of issues

4.4 INTERVIEW RESPONSES

4.4.1 Profile of respondents

As indicated above, 11 Ward Councillors inclusive of the Speaker were interviewed: 73% were male while 27% were female.

4.4.2 Participation

In respect of participation, the respondents were requested to outline challenges facing Ward committees, how elected officials balance what the people want against what the municipality prefers, and whether there are other committees or sub-committees over and above Ward committees. The respondents raised a number of challenges which impact negatively on Ward committee members' participation. These challenges vary from ward to ward and the major one relates to costs, in particular transport costs, with one respondent noting that, "while the municipality has dealt with this by paying members a stipend, in some instances payment takes long". The other challenge relates to Ward committee members not being recognised by municipal officials. As a result, members from some wards have raised the issue of being given name tags which will identify them as members, thus enabling them to have access to officials and enhance their participation.

The above is further exacerbated by a perception among members that their views and inputs are not taken seriously by Council, with one respondent observing that, "Very little attention is paid to their inputs despite having been established in terms of the law i.e Constitution, section 152(1) (e); local communities must be involved in the affairs' of local government. One good way of doing this is through Ward committees. There is a view that public participation is poor with some committees struggling to operate. They are generally perceived as talk shops".

Another issue which was raised by one respondent is that Ward committee members say that, "once they come to a meeting, the chair of the committee being the Ward Councillor would normally inform them on what needs to be done without them being engaged". In other words, the Ward Councillor does not share information but merely tells people what to do. This has the potential to demoralise members and thus inhibit participation. It was echoed by another respondent who said that, "Ward committees do not manage development policy. Ward committees make little input in development policy. Policy emerges from bureaucrats and officials and is sometimes presented to Ward committees, but generally goes to council for approval”. This was supported by a respondent who said that, “many of their recommendations when it comes to rezoning and other local issues are ignored. They never receive any feedback from council officials concerning their inputs”.

On balancing what communities want against what council prefers, this is done through the IDP process where they are asked to indicate what would be preferred as developmental areas. Comments included that, “Ward committee is the one to influence the budget and inform the IDP”; “Communities would raise matters which are a shopping list and not prioritise. Council then prioritises and the chairperson of the Ward committee provides feedback”. This is because the Council as a statutory body has the power to take decisions within its jurisdiction.

Notwithstanding the above, if communities are not satisfied with a decision, they have the right to petition the Council, as one respondent explained: “Decisions from council are majority decisions. If a decision is made by any committee of council or council itself, then residents or representative residents associations have a right to challenge those decisions on appeal and there are several ways to do that (Section 62 or 67 of Municipal Systems Act). Resident Association has a right to challenge decisions on appeal”.

On the question of other committees or sub-committees existing over and above the Ward committees, most respondents indicated that they do exist. However, where they exist, they differ from ward to ward. In other words, a Ward Councillor can model committees or sub-committees in whatever manner he/she wishes. In some instances, they are modelled around the municipal portfolio or departments while others are modelled around key developmental areas such as education, health, social development and crime.

4.4.3 Capacity

With regard to capacity, focal areas were whether rules governing Ward committees do exist, how training needs of Ward committees are determined taking into account the location of budget, and how Ward committees are to be capacitated. The municipality has a policy document called “Establishment of Ward committees” which was approved in May 2001. This document provides for, inter alia, powers, functions and responsibilities of Ward committees, composition and electoral regulation since, “There is no bye-law governing Ward committees but a set of rules”.

Pertaining to training, there is no systematic way of identifying training needs of Ward committee members, as explained: “There seems to be no uniform approach to training. Individual Ward Councillors pick up training programmes related to specific sectors and encourage members to attend”. It is generally assumed that all Ward committee members need to go through an induction training programme. To this effect, an induction workshop attended by Ward committee members upon election to office is conducted. At that workshop, a document called “Establishment, roles, responsibilities and functions of Ward committees” is distributed. This document is intended to clarify the roles of Ward committees and their relationship with the Council, according to one respondent: “They are taken through to understand their role. In other words they are workshopped around the document (by-law) and understanding exactly the operation of Ward committees and what their role will be”.

It emerged during the interviews that the above is not enough to capacitate committee members largely because election of community members to the Ward committee does not take into account literacy, numeracy, expertise and experience. However, it was noted that, “Ward committee members could be capacitated through being given good training”. The other issue mentioned was that the budget for training is centrally located in the Speaker’s office and is not enough, as confirmed by one respondent: “There is no budget set aside to capacitate members”.

On the issue of how committee members could be capacitated, it emerged that over and above training, the term of office of Ward committees should be aligned to the term of office of the council, as, “This will prevent a situation whereby the implementation of the Ward committee programmes aligned to council term of office is not disrupted by election of new members”. They also need to be capacitated on all municipality by-laws, how budget is formulated as well as how their needs become a priority within Council, taking into account the budget cycle.

4.4.4 Mandate

With regard to mandate, the focus was firstly on who defines or determines the agenda of Ward committee meetings and which issues get discussed. Secondly, there was discussion on whether conflict between Community Development Workers and Ward committee members occurs. Thirdly, the question of how issues raised by Ward committees find expression on the municipality's agenda was explored.

There is a misconception among Ward committee members with regard to what Ward committees are and should do. This happens especially when they are elected, as one respondent observed: "They (committee members) tend to forget that council is a statutory body with decision-making powers implying that whatever developments they want might not happen as speedily as they think because it has to go through processes of council". Furthermore, "The reality is they make inputs or suggestions which can either be accepted or rejected by council". To address this challenge, Ward committee members are taken through an induction workshop that clarifies their roles and those of other officials and structures of council. In essence, as mentioned by almost all respondents, the mandate of Ward committees is clarified to members. The challenge is whether that is understood or adhered to.

On the question of whether conflict occurs between the Community Development Workers and Ward committees, the general trend is that there has been moderate conflict. In other words, it has not been extreme enough to lead to a paralysis of municipal functions. As explained by one respondent, "There has been moderate conflict and not a lot. CDWs tend to overstep especially when dealing with community issues". This moderate conflict is as a result of the induction workshop having clarified the roles of each, where, "... the induction clarified the different roles i.e. that of Ward committee members and Community Development Workers".

4.5 CONCLUSION

This chapter has presented data on issues of participation, capacity and mandate. In respect of participation, the focus was on the regularity of meetings, whether Ward committee members are consulted on issues relating to the wards, and whether they make inputs. With regard to capacity, the focus was on training, training needs assessment and whether Ward committee members attended training.

On the issue of mandate, the focus was on whether issues to be discussed are clarified to Ward committee members. In general, there is a high level of participation from communities with regard to Ward committees. However, Ward committees are facing numerous challenges which, if not addressed, have the potential of creating apathy and inciting protest from communities.

CHAPTER FIVE

INTERPRETATION OF THE RESULTS

5.1 INTRODUCTION

An important element of any research or study is the link between the findings, that is, what is happening in practice and theory or literature. This is intended to determine whether the real-life situation follows a particular pattern as provided for theoretically in the literature. This is true because theory and practice have a reciprocal relationship with practice informing theory as well.

This chapter provides a link between the findings presented in the previous chapter and the theory. It focuses on the three identified themes: participation, capacity and mandate.

5.2 NEXUS WITH THE LITERATURE

The theory of local governance, as alluded to in the previous chapter on literature review, moves from the premise that the structure of government, how it relates to non-governmental institutions and how it executes its mandate within the context of democracy is a necessary precondition for effective and efficient service delivery. Underpinning this is a set of institutions, mechanisms and processes, through which citizens and their groups articulate their interests and needs, mediate their differences and exercise their rights and obligations.

Of critical importance is the manner in which the apparatus of the state is constituted, how it executes its mandate and its relationship to society in general and to particular constituencies such as the private sector, civil society, non-governmental organisations and community organisations; and lastly, how it fulfils the substantive aspects of democracy. It may be inferred, therefore, that structures of government should foster participation, and those participating should clearly understand their mandate and be appropriately capacitated.

5.2.1 Participation

Participation refers to the ways in which citizens exercise influence and control over decisions that affect them, and requires that the state treats citizens not only as voters but as active participants in decision-making. For this to happen, ideal conditions for public participation have to exist. These include the project being beneficial to the entire community; that citizens should not be geographically dispersed; that citizens should have adequate financial resources to enable them to attend meetings; the community has to be homogenous to allow for speedy decision-making; and the topic to be discussed should not be technically complex.

Focusing on participation as one of the themes in this study, indicators that were reviewed included the regularity of meetings, the extent of Ward committee members making inputs on policy issues, the extent of being consulted, the extent to which a year planner of meetings is circulated, and the extent to which Ward committee members advise the Ward Councillor. The above are premised on one of the principles of democracy, namely popular consultation, which requires firstly that some institutional machinery, through which public officials learn what kind of public policies the people wish to see adopted and enforced, should exist. Secondly, having ascertained the people's preferences, public officials should then put them into effect whether they themselves approve or not (Ranney, 1990: 112-115).

In the South African context, the institutional machinery is provided for in the Municipal Planning and Performance Regulations which place the onus on municipalities in instances where Ward committees do not exist for forums to be established. The regulations further provide that:

- The forum referred to above be representative of the composition of the community and comprise people identified by the community through mechanisms established by the municipality.
- The municipality convenes regular meetings of the forum to-
  - i. discuss the process to be followed in drafting the integrated development plan;

- ii. consult on the content of the integrated development plan;
- iii. monitor the implementation of the integrated development plan;
- iv. discuss the development, implementation and review of the municipality's performance management system; and
- v. monitor the municipality's performance in relation to the key performance indicators and performance targets set by the municipality.

The study revealed that institutions to facilitate popular consultation and/or public participation in the form of Ward committees do exist in Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality although not as widely as they should be. Some do comprise representatives from various stakeholders or groups as indicated in Table 2. This is in line with various pieces of legislation and policies, notably the White Paper on Local Government and Municipal Structures Act which places the responsibility on municipalities to provide for consultative mechanisms. It is also in line with the Municipal Systems Act which places more emphasis on the rights and duties of citizens with regard to municipal functions including their contributions towards the decision-making process of the municipality and receiving feedback in respect of decisions taken by council on issues affecting their rights.

In addition to the existence of institutions to facilitate public participation, the study has further revealed that meetings of Ward committees take place regularly, i.e. monthly as required by law. The majority of members make inputs on community issues on a monthly basis. However, the complex nature of some of the issues or policy documents such as the IDP and the budget, poses a challenge to the quality of inputs made. Hence discussions at meetings centre on operational issues such as incorrect billing, safety and security in their communities, as well as rezoning.

Another challenge is lack of financial resources that would enable members to attend meetings. On this issue, the study revealed that the municipality pays a stipend even though it takes a long time for it to be paid because of administrative processes that need to be followed.

5.2.2 Mandate

Governance, as defined by Mhone in Mhone and Edigheji (2003: 3), refers to the manner in which the apparatus of the state is constituted, how it executes its mandate and its relationship to society in general and to particular constituencies such as the private sector, civil society, non-governmental organisations and community organisations, and how it fulfils the substantive aspects of democracy. This requires that participants in apparatus of the state understand their mandates in a manner that will not encroach on the territories of others. It must further take into account the complex nature of the state and the issues to be dealt with.

Under this theme, the indicators considered are whether issues are clarified to members, who define or determine the agenda of the Ward committee meeting and whether there is conflict between Ward committee members and Community Development Workers (CDWs) or not. To address this and within the legislative context, pieces of legislation have been enacted to clarify the mandates of various stakeholders in local governance particularly as they relate to Ward committees, participation and consultation.

Chapter 7 (Section 152) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 stipulates that local government should, inter alia, provide democratic and accountable government for local communities, ensure the provision of services to communities in a sustainable manner, and encourage the involvement of communities and community organisations in matters of local government. Furthermore, the White Paper on Local Government of 1998 challenges local government to be developmental and encourages municipalities to establish strategies and mechanisms to continuously engage with citizens, business and community groups.

The above further provides for the establishment of Ward committees to facilitate local community participation in decisions which affect the community, the articulation of local community interests, and representation of these interests within the metropolitan government system. It must, however, be mentioned that for better decisions to emerge through the participatory process as indicated earlier, the careful selection of participants is important. This hinges on whether participants are appropriately representative of those they claim to represent. Thus a thorough stakeholder analysis focusing on their interests, strengths, assumptions and needs is crucial. In addition, the manner in which the participants communicate and also choose issues to be discussed is critical.

The research revealed that there are instances where a misconception arises with regard to the roles and mandate of Ward committee members. This could be further exacerbated by the introduction of Community Development Workers who act as a link between communities and local government as well as other statutory bodies. To deal with this, the municipality convenes induction workshops where roles of Ward committee members, municipal officials and councillors are clarified. Of importance to note is that there is no conflict between Ward committee members and CDWs which bodes well for the relationship of various stakeholders. The research further revealed that the agenda of Ward committee meetings is determined by the Ward Councillor even though in some instances members are requested to put items on the agenda.

5.2.3 Capacity

Under this theme, indicators looked at the existence of rules governing the establishment of Ward committees, the identification of training needs, provision of training, attendance of training programmes by Ward committee members, the extent to which the municipality provides information, regularity of information sharing sessions, and performance monitoring of Ward committee members. These indicators were identified taking into account the complex nature of local governance, policy development, implementation and monitoring as alluded to earlier in this document. They also took into account the means of participation which underpins the need to build capacity.

Means of participation enables citizens as a collective to be in a more favourable position of influencing government decisions than as individuals. Bekker (1996: 29) identifies interest and pressure groups as means of participation. Interest groups are all groups which seek to influence public policy in their own chosen direction, without accepting responsibility for government (Ehrman in Bekker, 1996: 30). Pressure groups are any organization that endeavours to influence the policies of government without accepting responsibility for public office (Wootton in Bekker, 1996: 30). Flowing from this, it can be seen that interest and pressure groups are synonymous. These could be likened to civil society which had been defined earlier.

Another means of participation is through the utilization of extension staff. They provide a link between those making policies and citizens who are to be affected by those policies. The link may also have a more general purpose in that information about local needs and conditions can be communicated to local authorities and that information about local government policies and programmes can be provided to the people (Brynard in Bekker, 1996: 138).

In the South African context, with particular reference to local government, extension staff could be said to equate to Community Development Workers (CDWs). They are special public servants who engage with citizens and determine what services are needed, so as to ensure that these services are made available. CDWs link communities with a range of government services and programmes. This is seen as a means of capacitating Ward committees on issues of development and service delivery. Put differently, they entail joint decision-making between public officials and citizens as they seek ways of delivering services to communities. The glue that keeps this relationship intact is government trust in citizens, citizen efficacy and trust in government, citizen competence, government responsiveness and legitimacy.

The study revealed that there is no structured way of identifying their training needs. Training centres around the provision of an induction for members to clarify their roles. There is no training programme over and above the induction training programme. Because members are expected to attend the induction programme, the study revealed that they did attend such, either once and in some instances more than once. This is due to some members serving more than one term. The study further revealed that the municipality provides information and that members share information at such induction sessions.

5.3 CONCLUSION

Theory is generally based on the assessment of data and provides the basis from which logical conclusions can be drawn. In doing so, patterns and potential causal relationships among opinions and actions are identified. This implies that the relationship between theory and practice is crucial because without theoretical knowledge it is not easy to utilise the skills in practice to make correct decisions.

This chapter has attempted to highlight the link between theory as outlined in the chapter on literature review and the findings derived from data collection. By so doing, the relationship between the theory of governance and the findings were presented, taking into account participation, capacity of Ward committees and the understanding of their roles.

CHAPTER SIX

SUMMARY AND RECOMMENDATIONS

6.1 INTRODUCTION

The democratic dispensation of 1994 envisaged a situation whereby there will be an effective and efficient local government system. Among measures to make this system effective and efficient were the establishment of Ward committees as provided for through government policies and legislation, where the intention was to promote public participation.

This chapter will provide a summary of the research report as well as recommendations. It will start by highlighting the significant learning points followed by a relationship model conceptualised from those points.

6.2 LOCAL GOVERNMENT EVOLUTION

6.2.1 Global perspective

Local government which is the sphere closest to communities they serve evolved over time. Their evolution is premised around the need to identify local problems, set priorities for development, mobilise resources, implement programmes, and monitor and evaluate progress. In Europe for instance, local government was considered as both a provider of public services and a public body based on a community of local people. In Latin America, the evolution followed a major process of decentralisation with central features including greater political autonomy and its strengthening.

In the Asia-Pacific region, most countries undertook reforms aimed at decentralising and devolving government functions to the local level. Issues that drove the reform process included public sector efficiency, democratisation and changing political-economic regimes to mixed and market economies. In the United States, local governments are governmental jurisdictions below the level of the state with most states having two tiers, namely counties and municipalities. Counties and county-equivalents form the first tier administrative division of the states although not all of them have organised county governments. In areas lacking county governments, services are provided by lower level townships, municipalities or states.

In Africa, the evolution of local government was necessitated by what was referred to as “democratic” decentralisation. By this is meant that significant elements of authority, responsibility for services, fiscal and human resources are transferred to local governments. Major revisions in accountability were enacted so that the local public had a significant role in its own “local governance”, through the existence of working local systems of collective action that manage a locality’s public affairs and are accountable to local residents.

There has been a substantial rise in the number of democratic political systems since the 1990s as opposed to the 1950s and 1960s, the two decades following African independence. During that time, one-party political systems predominated and access to state power was often gained by means of coups d’état. The report further states that, “most political systems are now multiparty and leaders are chosen by universal suffrage. In respect of local government, many countries such as Mozambique, Benin, Mauritania and South Africa allow independent candidates in local elections despite allowing political parties to monopolise local and national politics.

6.2.2 South African perspective

In South Africa, local government evolved as a form of decentralised local indirect self-government, area bound and limited in powers though it may be. The legal framework over time provided for the form, content, powers and functions to be performed at that level. To ensure greater participation by communities, the Ward committee system was introduced. This worked alongside the single constituency systems which were applicable in all the then provinces, which were Cape, Orange Free State and Transvaal, as well as for Black local authorities, except in Natal where boroughs were divided into at least nine wards. Their role entailed being a form of contact between the people and municipal commissioners. The number of wards was determined by the administrator within the powers vested in Provinces. Despite the noble approach of establishing local government, it was based along racial lines and became a source of contention leading to community struggles and subsequently local government reform.

Local government reform in South Africa followed a protracted process of negotiations dating back to the late 1980s. During that period, individual local authorities, political parties and civic organisations engaged in negotiations in order to shape the structures of municipalities within their localities. The process gained momentum following the State of the Nation address by the then President of South Africa, F.W. de Klerk in 1991 and culminated in the establishment, within the ambit of the Interim Measures for Local Government Act of 1991, of local government negotiating forums across the country.

This culminated in the current electoral system which provides for proportional and ward representation. The provision of ward representation was intended to, inter alia, allow for greater community participation in policy-making and thus improve service delivery at local government level. To this effect, a legislative framework governing such reform was developed. The main documents within that framework are the Constitution of South Africa, White Paper on Local Government, Municipal Structures Act, Municipal Systems Act and Municipal Planning and Performance Management Regulations.

Despite the transformation process that took place, the legislative framework provided, and the subsequent delimitation of wards, including the establishment of Ward committees in most municipalities, service delivery has not improved at local government level. The challenge seems to be that Ward committees, having been established to facilitate public participation at local government level and subsequently the management of development policy, are not as effective as they should be. In other words, participation in those committees is not seen at the level that was anticipated. Where it is at the expected level, participants do not appear to be sufficiently capacitated and do not fully understand their mandate.

Studies conducted with regard to Ward committees in municipalities such as Msunduzi, Buffalo and Nelson Mandela have not addressed this challenge in any depth and have focused more on community participation. This study, although not comprehensive, has focused not only on public participation but on determining the extent to which Ward committee members understand their mandate in respect of the management of development policy. It also focused on the extent to which they are capacitated. Consequently, significant learning points emerged.

6.3 SIGNIFICANT LEARNING POINTS

6.3.1 Participation

The study has identified that the Municipality complies with the legislation that requires Ward committees to be established. This is in part intended to ensure the facilitation of local community participation, the articulation of local community interests and the representation of those interests within the Municipality. As a move to enhance the above, Ward committee meetings take place on a monthly basis as required by law and a year planner of such is distributed well in advance. In addition it confirmed some of the findings from other case studies in that public participation is provided for in various municipalities that opted for their establishment, albeit with challenges. It also showed some improvements on issues that were hindering the operations of Ward committees, such as financial resources to enable members to attend meetings.

Notwithstanding the above, participation and thus consultation with communities and citizens is usually limited to the compulsory consultation interactions defined in the various acts such as the Municipal Systems and Municipal Structures Acts, particularly in relation to issues of Integrated Development Plans (IDP) and budgets. In essence and taking into account the complex nature of issues presented in both the IDP and budgets, it is conducted to comply with the requirements of the legislation rather than paying more attention to the inputs of Ward committee members. Policy terrain seems to be a contested area with limited involvement of Ward committee members, leading to them getting involved or fighting to be involved in operational issues of the municipality. This negates what the systems theory of policy-making calls for, namely the contributions of inter-related forces.

6.3.2 Mandate

Effective participation is dependent on whether or not the participants understand their mandate. This understanding cuts across being able to articulate the views of the group that is being represented. In this context, the manner in which they communicate and also select issues to be discussed cannot be underestimated. The rallying point is the building of relationships among participating stakeholders. As mentioned earlier in this report, the glue that keeps a relationship together in the context of governance is government trust in citizens, citizen efficacy and trust in government, citizen competence, government responsiveness and legitimacy. Citizen competence presupposes that their mandate is understood. With this in mind, it is imperative that Ward committee members should fully understand their mandate.

The study established that the municipality has taken upon itself to convene a session immediately after the election of Ward committee members where their roles and responsibilities are clarified. During that session, roles and responsibilities of municipal officials as well as those of councillors are explained. This helps a great deal in preventing conflicts that normally occur when various stakeholders engage one another. As was observed in other case studies, and confirmed by the findings of this study, to some extent Ward committee members were aware of their mandate despite some having a poor educational background which limits their contribution to discussions. In addition, Ward committee members are consulted on issues that need to be discussed. In other words, they participate in formulating agenda items for meetings.

6.3.3 Capacity

Seeing that governance is concerned with how rules or structures affect political action and the prospect of solving societal problems, and exists when there is trust, reciprocity, accountability and authority, the capacity of those affected by the rules or participating in governance structures is crucial. Furthermore, the literature identified that policy implementation is a complex process involving various levels or organs and actors influenced by the environment within which it is taking place. To this effect, making sure that Ward committee members go through training programmes in various areas relevant to local governance is strongly recommended. The idea is to empower them to understand complex policy issues.

The research established that the Municipality focuses on an induction programme as opposed to a comprehensive training programme. It is therefore not surprising when Ward committee members focus their attention on operational issues rather than shaping the policy direction that a ward and subsequently a municipality should follow. There exists a need for regular training in order for Ward committee members to be able to influence policy-making.

Furthermore, and in keeping with the group model of policy-making, various groups are represented on Ward committees. However, representation by those groups seems to be uneven or limited. It does not seem like those groupings are capacitated to make meaningful inputs on policy development, implementation, monitoring and evaluation.

6.4 RELATIONSHIP MODEL

The outcome of the research as well as the learning points gained led to the conceptualisation of the following relationship model for the enhancement of the Ward committee system.

The above model moves from the premise that, at the core of a relationship with particular reference to the community level, lays three inter-dependent groups of stakeholders and these are political, administration and civil society. In the context of local government; the circle depicting the political comprises councillors; administration, the municipal officials; and civil society, the various groups existing within a community. The centre which represents a Ward committee system provides the space for interaction between the political structure, the administration of the municipality, and the community.

Thus the link and co-operation among those stakeholders is critical in ensuring that there is effective and efficient service delivery. Debates that will ensue at the centre will ensure that policy and practice is aligned to effect meaningful change at community level. The common denominator in the relationship is to satisfy the needs, aspirations and desires of the community. To minimise confusion and conflict, it will be important for stakeholders to understand their roles.

In respect of the above relationship model, councillors sitting in a council, irrespective of whether they are ward or proportional councillors, should execute the following functions:

- Exercise the executive and legislative responsibilities in respect of the municipality. In the case of a ward, these responsibilities will pertain to executive leadership.
- Formulate policies.
- Provide political direction, leadership and motivation to municipal officials and public on policy issues.
- Provide overall political control and management of the council.
- Consult the community with regard to service delivery.
- Promote and ensure that development takes place in the community.
- Administration, which is to a large extent made up of municipal officials, should ensure that the centre functions effectively and efficiently. In doing so, it should undertake the following functions:

- Provide technical and administrative support to the Ward committee;
- Undertake training needs assessment of Ward committee members;
- Facilitate training and capacity building of Ward committee members;
- Supply and summarise documents to be perused and discussed by Ward committee members; and
- Create awareness to the community with regard to what the role of Ward committees are.

The civil society component of the model moves from the premise that at the community level there exist various interest groups whose needs and interests must be provided for. To advance these needs and interests as depicted in the model, civil society contributes to decision-making through the Ward committee system. To this effect, written and oral recommendations for deliberations and decision-making should be made.

The above could be achieved by firstly, building social alliances to advance development agenda at community level. Secondly, engage in civic action that is positive in fostering development. Thirdly, make follow-ups on promises made in order to advocate for their realisation. Fourthly, engage in advocacy work to press for a range of policy objectives. The fifth step is to act as agents for promoting good governance such as transparency and accountability. Finally, the community should be mobilised to participate fully in politics and public affairs.

6.5 RECOMMENDATIONS

Based on the research findings, the summary and learning points made above, the following recommendations are made to the Municipality:

1. Improve communication and information with citizens and in particular Ward committee members. This means firstly, translating the IDPs, audit reports and policy documents into more accessible documents in local languages, where possible. Secondly, important information should be made easily and widely available. Thirdly, the Council should demonstrate that it listens to residents and takes complaints seriously by deploying senior officials to Ward committees.

2. Allocate resources to Ward committees to encourage participation beyond the compulsory moments prescribed in various pieces of legislation. This is because lack of resources makes Ward committee members feel marginalized.
3. Promote the establishment of new, or strengthening of existing interest groups to cater for various interests in the ward. This will allow a fair representation of various interests in the community and make engagement easy and fruitful.
4. Ensure that issues raised by Ward committees are acted upon and where they have not been acted upon, feedback on reasons be provided. People tend to sustain their participation if they feel that their participation in the past had practical results.
5. Make technical staff available to assist the Ward committees with technical issues.
6. Undertake training needs analysis, develop training programmes and conduct training that will address training gaps among Ward committee members.
7. Convene regular network sessions where members will share ideas on issues of common interests. These networking sessions could be approached from the perspective of panel discussions where experts are invited to share best practice in local government.
8. Provide a summary of issues to be discussed by Ward committees such as IDPs, budgets and policy documents. This will address the complexity of those documents

6.6 CONCLUSION

Good governance has become widely accepted as a critical condition for advancing development agendas despite observations that democratic politics have not delivered better outcomes for the poor in developing countries. Recent trends challenge the conventional wisdom that democratic institutions advance the needs and aspirations of the people. A critical approach to the dynamics of power and the interactions between influential stakeholders (business groups, political elites, the military, the media, civil society and international aid system) is necessary.

This chapter provided a summary and recommendations in respect of improving the workings of Ward committees with particular reference to Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality. These focused on how development policy, which is deliberate action by public institutions seeking to promote development, could be managed.
